Providing a safe place to work is an integral part of demonstrating sustainability in an organization

In 2016, the International Labour Organization's (ILO) Committee on Decent Work in Global Supply Chains adopted a resolution and a set of action-oriented conclusions to bridge governance gaps and address labour concerns including that of Occupational Health & Safety (OHS) throughout global supply chains.

The market sees Sustainable Companies as a good investment, and customers reward them with brand loyalty. It seeks to ensure that supply chain partners demonstrate principles of sustainability including providing a safe place to work.

OHS is very closely aligned with top business priorities such as sustainability, supply chain accountability, and corporate reputation. By recognizing and leveraging these connections,

Organisational Leadership can play an important role in business growth and competitiveness.

“Aligning Safety Initiatives with Business to be Successful” can be easily achieved by focusing on Partnering with Businesses to achieve common goals and by developing strong safety management systems supported by a robust safety culture.

The conference, therefore, deliberates on the above issue to integrate OHS into the corporate governance structure, including Board sub-committees such as risk and audit, and also align the corporate values with the OHS objectives and strategies.
